Story: Shlichus from Shamayim: Chapter 3:

By: Moshe Goldwasser

Recap: Rav Aharon was struggling on a piece of Gemara and then someone gave him an envelope that explained all the questions he had. He looked up and saw it was the town wagon driver that had died a few years ago...

“What have you done that you were Zocheh to this Shlichus?” Rav Aharon asked curiously. The wagon driver hesitated. “I’m unable to reveal everything that goes on in Shamayim,” he said slowly, “but I’ll tell you a bit.” “When I passed away, I had my judgment, it was decreed that due to my bad habit for doing avairos, I would need to return to this world as a gilgul, this way I would be given the chance to rectify my sins so that I would merit my share in Olam Haba’ah. I was trembling of fear when I heard I would need to return as a gilgul. I was terrified to return to the world of the living, where I would be faced with so many more Nisyonos, perhaps making my situation even worse than it already was. But I knew I didn’t have a choice.” The wagon driver looked up at Rav Aharon and continued his story. “As I sat there shivering in fright, a new malach got up and said that it wasn’t proper that I should become a gilgul. “I am the malach who was created from the amazing mitzvah this wagon driver did, and I testify that this man does not deserve to be a gilgul.” As a wagon driver I often drove people through the dangerous forest. To protect myself and my passengers from the robbers and bandits, I would arm myself with weapons before setting out on a dangerous journey. I would travel through the trees, keeping my eyes and ears open for any forewarning trouble ahead. One day I was traveling through the forest, I noticed something dangling from a tree; it was a person. Terrified, I wanted to drive as fast and as far away as I could from the dangling corpse. Suddenly, it struck me that, that person might be a yid! Perhaps he was still alive. Cautiously, I approached the tree and saw that I was correct, he was a Jew, and miraculously, he was still alive! Working quickly, I cut the ropes and freed the dying man.”

Topic: Hilchos Shabbos: Accelerating the cooking process (part 3 of 3)

3. Stirring: Stirring also accelerates the cooking process. Therefore, it is Assur to stir a pot of partially cooked liquid. This issur extends even to a pot that has been removed from the stove; the partially cooked contents may not be stirred as long as they remain at the temperature of Yad Tziledes Bo. Removing some partially cooked from a pot that is off the fire is similar to stirring and therefore it is the chachamim made it Assur.

4. Covering a pot: Covering a pot also hastens the cooking process. Therefore, one may not cover a pot of partially cooked food. If a pot that is sitting on some source of heat became uncovered, one is not allowed to replace its cover unless the food is completely cooked. Even if the cover is lifted momentarily, one may not replace it on the pot. Practically speaking, therefore, one must be aware of lifting the cover of any pot on the blech unless one is certain that the contents are completely cooked.

5. Closing the oven door: Closing an oven door causes the interior temperature to rise dramatically, thereby advancing the cooking process. Therefore, an open oven door may not be closed if any food in the oven is not completely cooked. Accordingly, one should be aware of opening an oven door if there is food inside that is not fully cooked.
